

Document Citation

Title New blood

Author(s) Amy Taubin

Amy Taubin

Source Village Voice

Date 1997 Jun 10

Type article

Language English

English

Pagination

No. of Pages 1

Subjects Fessenden, Larry

Independent film-making -- United States

Independent film-making -- United States

Film Subjects Habit, Fessenden, Larry, 1996

New Blood

was too complicated to market."

Tapped by Kelly Reichert for a leading role in her directorial debut

n both his films and his person, Larry Fessenden defies expectations. With the independent film world now driven by marketing conventions imported whole hog from Hollywood, it's no wonder Fessenden fears falling through the cracks. Even he isn't sure what to put on the poster for Habit.

Three years in the making, Habit is "the other Downtown female vampire flick," the one that was just starting postproduction when Abel Ferrara's The Addiction and Michael Almereyda's Nadja bombed at the box office. Fessenden never worried that the film, which he wrote, directed, and edited, and in which he also stars, might be mistimed. "In my own twisted mind, I believed that since Habit was a remake of a feature I made on video in 1980 when I was at NYU film school, it had preceded all of them. It even preceded The Hunger as an updated realism-based revamping of the vampire story." Try telling that to the festivals (Toronto, Sundance, Berlin) and the dozens of distributors and sales agents that passed on the picture.

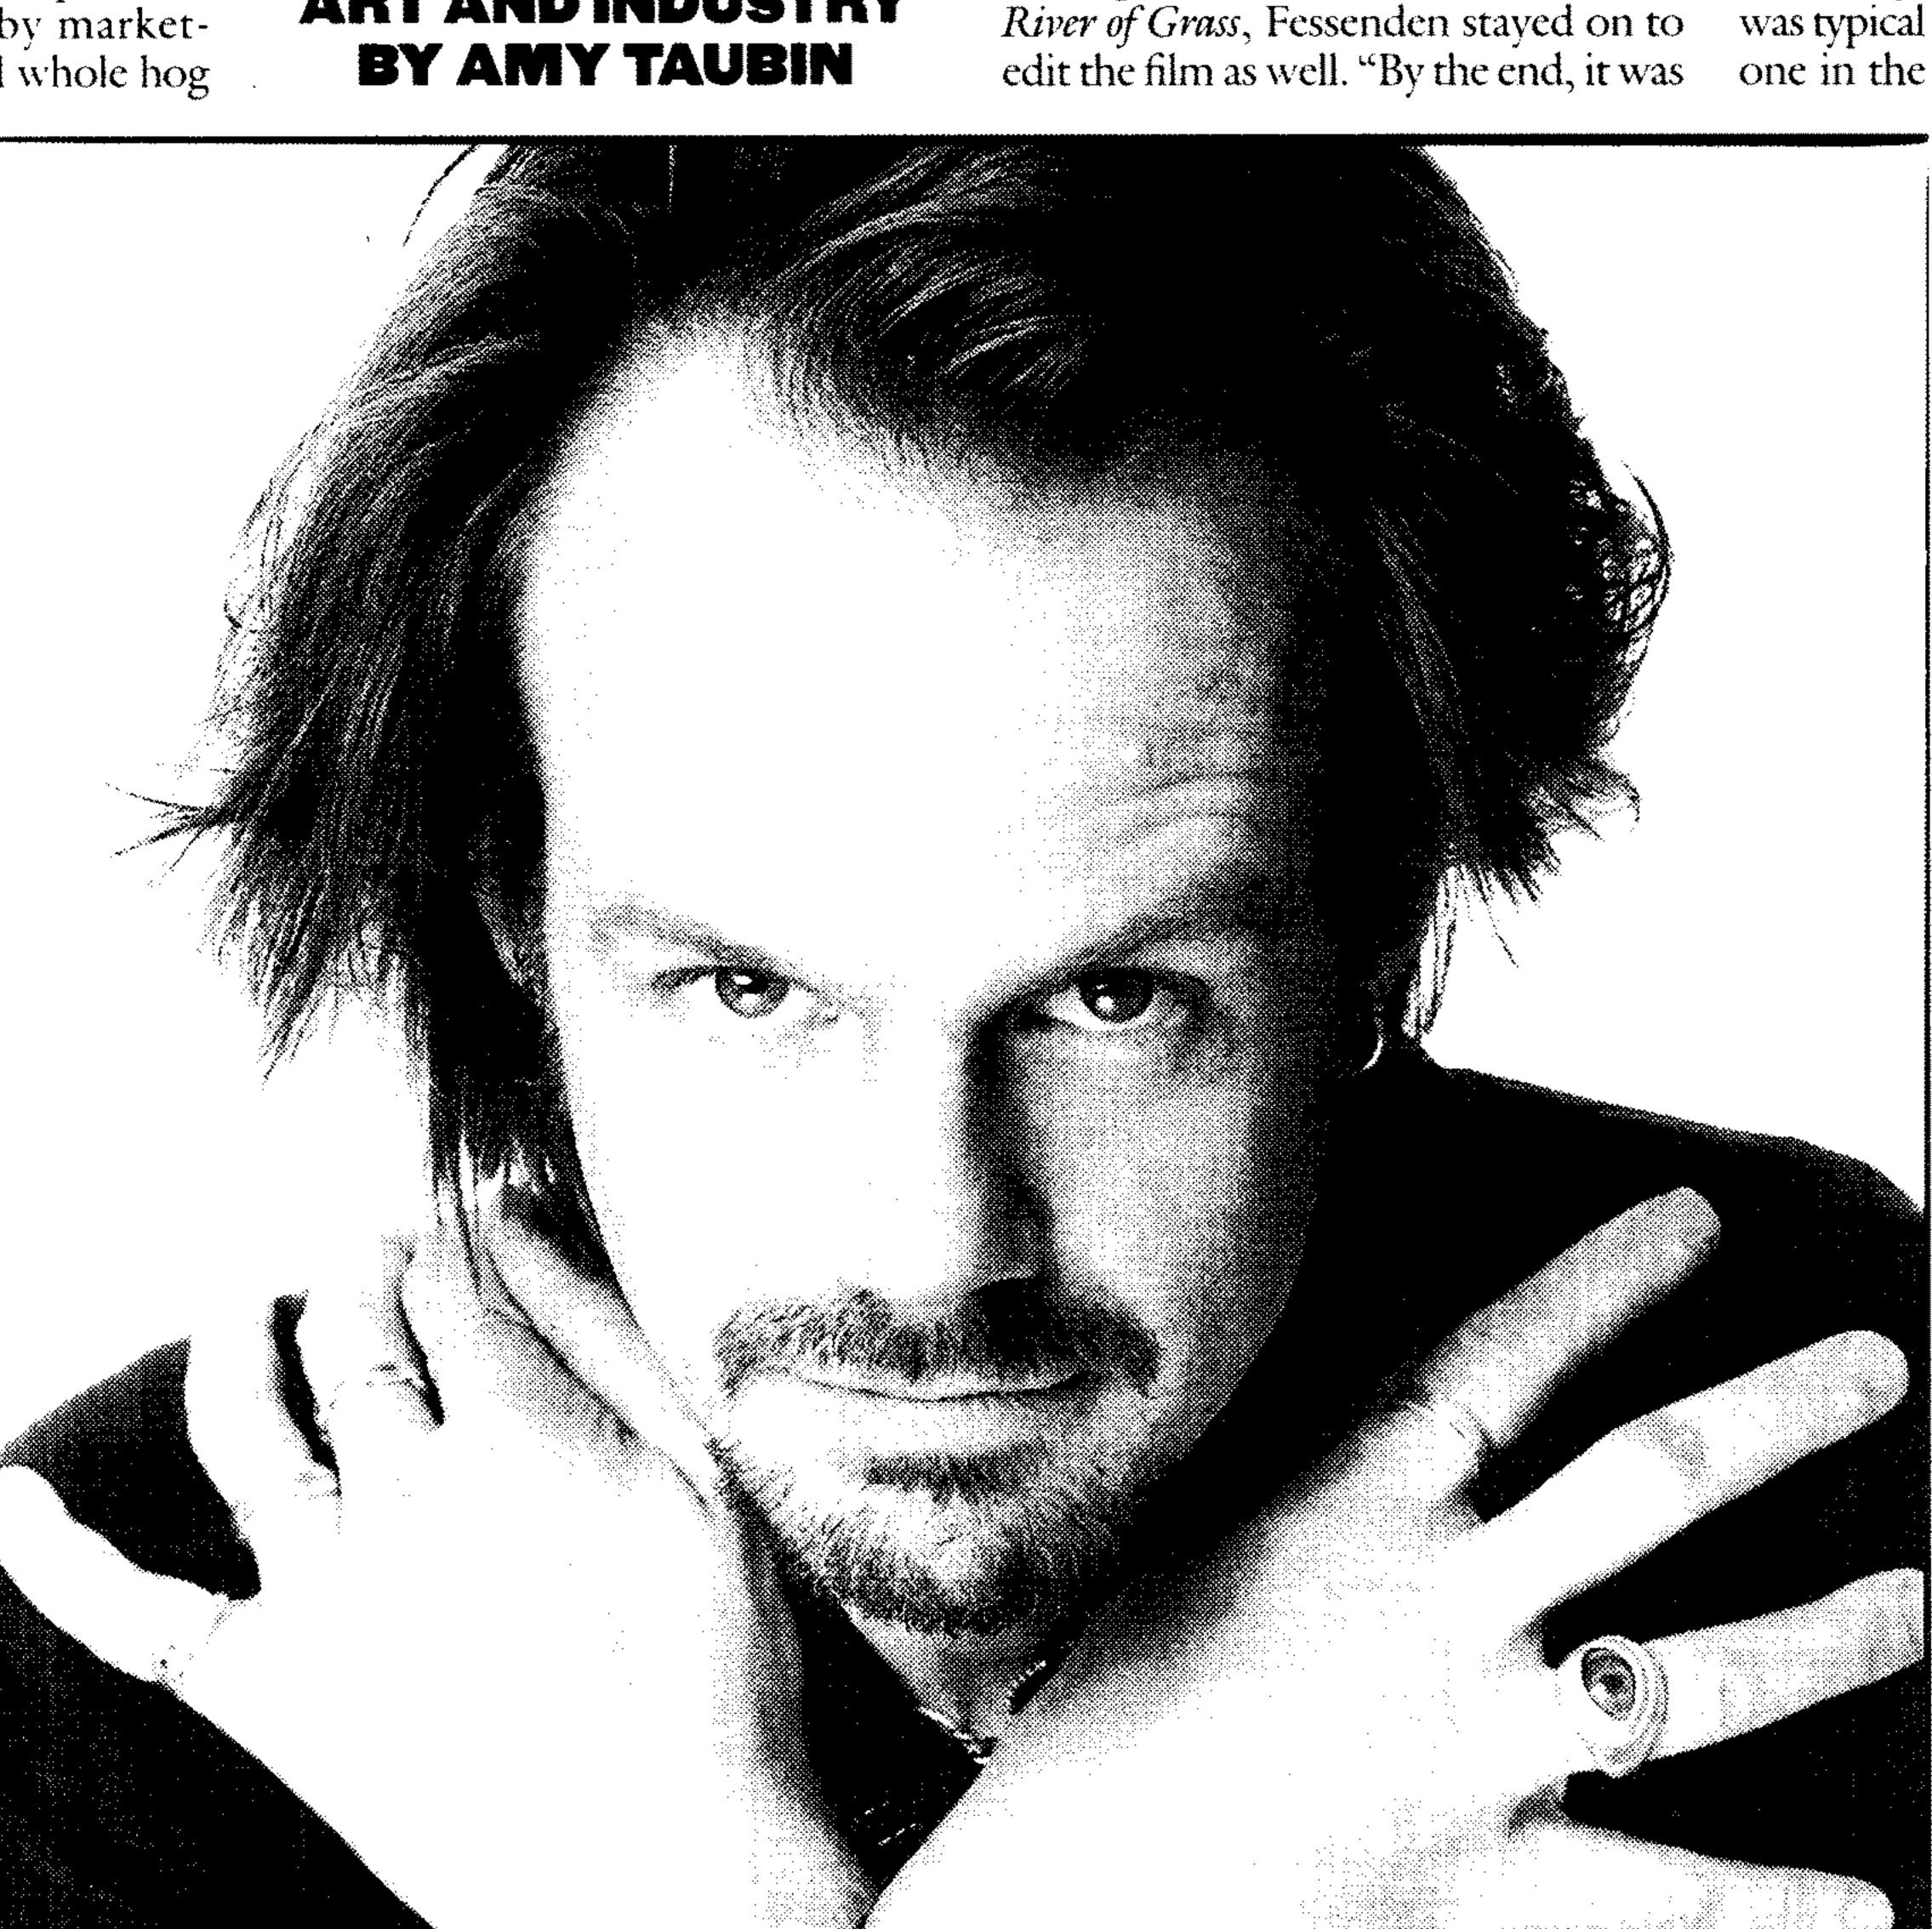

To be perfectly honest, having mistaken Habit for an exploitation venture, I avoided it until Fessenden won this year's Someone To Watch Award, a $20,000 cash prize jointly created by the Independent Feature Project West and Swatch watches. The award is given to "a filmmaker of exceptional talent and unique vision who hasn't vet received sufficient recognition for her or his work." Like the previous recipients Lodge Kerrigan and Christopher Munch, Fessenden fits the bill disconcertingly well. Accepting his award, Fessenden, who looks like a runty Jack Nicholson minus one front tooth, said the check would go to pay his crew, who worked on deferment to support his filmmaking, um, er, habit.

Habit, which I finally saw in a new 35mm incarnation, turns out to be the most vivid of the Downtown vampire movies—as evocative of New York-style paranoia as Rosemary's Baby, Bad Lieutenant, or Taxi Driver. "In a way, it's too bad that people know about the vampire aspect in advance, because otherwise, for the first half hour, you wouldn't know what kind of movie it is," says the sweetly perverse Fessenden. "Maybe it's a movie about

Giving Filmmakers Hope and Money

ART AND INDUSTRY

Larry Fessenden: "It got to be a humiliation that I was still working on Habit every day."

a drunk. It's designed to have a cumulative effect. It's about what you project onto it." And in fact, I didn't think Habit was the least bit scary—until the screening was over and I found myself, in broad daylight, fleeing across University Place, to avoid a group of perfectly ordinary people gathered outside a pizza place.

Fessenden grew up in a well-todo Upper East Side family. He went to prep school at Andover, didn't graduate, got his G.E.D., and enrolled at NYU, where he was torn between filmmaking and acting. In 1985, he set up Glass Eve Pix, an indie production company. Under the Glass Eve banner, he directed The Impact Addict Videos (a collaboration with high-risk performance artist David Leslie), Hollow Venus (1989), a one-hour video based on actress Heather Woodbury's experiences as a go-go dancer, and No Telling (1991), a smart, spare, skewed update of the Frankenstein story. Otherwise known as "the animal rights, anti-pesticide movie," No Telling was never released in the U.S. "Harvey -Weinstein was interested," says Fessenden, "but then he decided that it just Kelly and me. It was a good experience—a reminder of how to make films cheaply and intimately, and in that way an inspiration for Habit.

"So in the spring of '94, I rewrote Habit and got in touch with Dayton Taylor, who had been a production manager on No Telling. I had about $50,000 in place, and we devised a way to shoot it for that. Frank DeMarco, who DP'd Theremin, got hooked on the project and committed. Our concept was to invite people to participate. We offered them deferments obviously, but they also could participate in the enormous wealth that would come from the release. They're still waiting."

With Fessenden playing the leading role of a Loisaida alcoholic who becomes sexually obsessed with a woman whose taste for blood blends with his own, Habit was shot on and off from September 1994 to February 1995, a total of 45 days. Fessenden edited the film himself, finishing in October 1995, just in time to get into the Chicago Film Festival. "We invited Roger Ebert to the press screening and he gave it a nice blurb. So things looked good. But then we didn't get into Sundance or

Programme State of the State of Berlin. And now we're into the spring of 1996. We had a great screening at Indie Night at the Walter Reade, but it was typical of Habit's timing that everyone in the industry was in Cannes so none of the distributors saw it with that fabulous, enthusiastic audience. I sent tapes to the usual suspects from October to Sony Classics to Trimark and to about 30 foreign sales agents, and they all passed."

Based on the response at the Walter Reade screening, Fessenden decided to trim a few minutes out of the film and do some work on the sound before bumping it up to 35mm. "It got to be a humiliation that I was still working on Habit every day. I finally finished the 35mm print in 1997." (Total production cost: $190,000, plus deferments.) "Meanwhile, Facets had been asking us to show it in their art house in Chicago. We opened there on April 21. Roger Ebert came back to see the new cut and we got a full-fledged review from him and others, and they were pretty good." Fessenden's being modest—they were monev reviews for sure. "Then the next day I got the Swatch award. I felt \(\frac{1}{2}\) that after working for \(\frac{1}{2}\) years, I'd finally been wel- comed into the film community." Fessenden hopes to get Habit into theaters in time for Halloween.

As of vet no distributor has bit.

mong Habit's champions is Peter Broderick, a longtime advocate of no-budget filmmaking who heads the Swatch awards committee. Broderick, who has been my screening buddy at the IFFM for nearly a decade, has just launched Next Wave Films, financed by the Independent Film Channel and dedicated to providing finishing funds for ultra-low-budget (under $200,000) English-language indies from all over the world. Next Wave can supply up to $100,000 for four films every year. Only films that have completed principal photography will be considered. Next Wave will also serve as a producers' rep on the films it finances, helping filmmakers devise festival strategies and secure distribution.

"We're looking for exceptionally talented filmmakers who are not only working on terrific movies that have real theatrical potential, but who, we feel, will make many more." Next Wave is setting up offices in Santa Monica. For information, call 310-392-1720.

WARNING: This material may be protected by copyright law (Title 17 U.S. Code)